

This architectural drawing depicts a building facade, oriented vertically. The central portion of the drawing features a series of rectangular openings, likely windows or doors, arranged in a vertical column. These openings are separated by thin vertical lines, creating a grid-like pattern. The top and bottom of this central section are defined by horizontal lines. On either side of this central column are two long, narrow vertical sections. These sections contain a series of small, rectangular elements, possibly representing windows or decorative panels, arranged in a regular, repeating pattern. The entire drawing is rendered in black lines on a white background, with a clean, minimalist aesthetic. The vertical orientation of the drawing suggests it might be a section or a detail of a larger architectural plan.